Coupling of motor units in the flexor digitorum profundus muscle: relation of motoneuron firing pattern to patellar reflex. Human patellar reflexes were examined in relation to the characteristics of the pattern of motoneuron firing during flexor digitorum profundus (FDP) muscle activation. The FDP muscle was stimulated at intensities producing reflexes of different magnitudes (5-50 mg). Short-latency reflexes were studied in three different subgroups: a first group with a latencies of less than 12 ms; a second group with latencies between 12 and 20 ms; and a third group with latencies greater than 20 ms. The motoneuron discharge patterns during activation of the FDP muscle were analysed by means of the line integral method. One or two components having short time constants were identified in all the subjects. The number of components with short time constants was similar in the reflexes elicited by the two smallest reflex intensity levels (5 and 10 mg) in all subgroups. At reflex intensities ranging from 10 to 25 mg, however, the number of the short time constant components decreased in the reflexes with latencies shorter than 12 ms, whereas it increased in the reflexes with latencies longer than 12 ms. At the highest reflex intensity (50 mg), the short time constant component of the reflexes with latencies shorter than 12 ms disappeared, whereas the reflexes with latencies greater than 12 ms maintained the same number of components. We conclude that the motoneuron recruitment pattern in the FDP muscles changes with stimulus intensity. The short time constant components of the reflex are considered to reflect the recruitment of higher motor units, whereas the longer time constant components are attributed to the recruitment of lower motor units. We propose that the reflex inhibition in the FDP muscle observed at lower stimulus intensities, i.e. at intensities producing short latency reflexes, is mediated by higher motor units. The reflex activation observed at the highest stimulus intensity is likely to originate from the recruitment of lower motor units.(ABSTRACT TRUN

When you create a locker, it will automatically create a sub-folder with a self-generated name. The name of that sub-folder will be used as the part of a name of your locker. For more information you can visit this link: A: i'm on kubuntu, so i didn't have kde packages available. the website is a bit short on details. it seems to require kdelibs, but i can't find it on their site. anyway, a good simple alternative is kde-robin for linux or kde-wizard for windows. both of them are cross platform and will allow you to lock your folders, even if a program has a lock (to stay safe from brute-force attacks). Configuring a router will not provide access to your configuration ports; it will only provide access to your web and admin ports. These ports should remain open on the router so that you can update the firmware or access your admin web management interface. To access your admin web management interface, you must use a web browser that is directly connected to the port (192.168.1.1) on your router. The admin port can be accessed by typing 192.168.1.1 into the browser. It is disabled by default but can be enabled by modifying the router's web and admin ports. For more information, see our guides for How to Configure a Router and How to Set Port Forwarding on a Router.
